Conference Theme:

The lesson of good literature seems to be the degree in which one can understand one self and the nation through the narrative of history, politics and ethics. Derrida had been engaged with the question of ethics and literature long before its public presentation in the 1980's. I.A .Richards's Practical Criticism has some strong lines in it-"If we are neither to swim blindly in schools under the suggestion of fashion, nor to shudder into paralysis before the inconceivable complexity of experience, we must find means of exercising our power of choice". Thus swerving away from a "simplistic, uncomplicated prescription of external ethical forces "and presenting a "prescriptive or doctrinaire form of reading" (Davis and Womack 2001: x). Richards seems to suggest that there is a necessity of an encounter between reader and text as "other" where reader at the center will search for an alignment and inter-textual negotiation between literature and ethics taking in account history and politics as two most powerful signifiers of the human world. The contemporary ethical criticism delivers effectively to describe and give shape to what has always existed and consequently has gone too long to "rehashing" and "reheating" the "leftovers" of the literature of the world. (Davis and Womack 2001: ix). It has also addressed the moral potential of the humans in a given community through language and thought which do the re-shaping of what has always existed through re-articulation and re-contextualizing the available established texts that Friedrich Nietzsche describes as the monumental history beloved of "gifted egoists and visionary scoundrels" (LC Bhabha, 2009:221) or ideological correlatives of the Western sign-empiricism, idealism, mimetism, monoculturalism (using Said's term) that sustain the global cultural authority.
